Career Design

Revolutionizing how you think, feel and experience work

The first principle of ethical power is Purpose. By Purpose, I don't mean your objective or intention—something toward which you are always striving. Purpose is something bigger. It is the picture you have of yourself—the kind of person you want to be or the kind of life you want to lead.

You have a unique Career

Design. You were born with it. You knew it as a child. But somewhere along the way you stopped trusting yourself and started listening to what your parents, the media and society thought you should do.

Most likely, you are reading this because you are experiencing a significant life transition. Perhaps you are, or are about to be, between jobs; you have been laid-off or are simply done with the work you do now; you are a college graduate entering the work force for the first time or you are re-entering the workforce after a hiatus: You are desiring—or being forced into—change. This is good.

You have an opportunity right now to uncover your innate Career Design and learn how to let yourself succeed.

Currently your brain is filled with habits of thought which have their own neurological pathways, ideas that, statistically, solidify around the age of twelve. These old ideas obscure your view of the perfect Design at your core.

Once you have regained access to your innate Design you will learn how to use this knowledge of your blueprint to find work that you love and achieve more satisfaction from the work that you choose. This moment of job and life upheaval is an invitation to become buoyant: Your Design is your personal career flotation device.

No matter what is happening with the economy, knowing your Career Design will make you resilient: You will be employable anywhere at any time, because you will not only know how to adapt your design to new and different work situations as needed, but you will find that new job opportunities will find you.

Reconnecting with your innate Wisdom and understanding your Design will open up opportunities for more ease, satisfaction and happiness in all areas of your life.
